

I am very pleased to see that the FCC is taking further actions to better serve the privacy of consumers in the area of unwanted telemarketing calls to their homes. The Telephone Consumer Protection Act in 1991 was the first step taken to better protect the consumer and the Do-Not-Call act of 2003 will hopefully provide even more protection to the consumer by better defining the right and regulations the telemarketing companies have in who they call and how often. I strongly agree that these types of regulations need to be enforced because I myself still receive a high volume of unwanted telemarketing calls at my residence. As a college student I find myself being the target for many telemarketing companies especially with companies such as credit cards. I live in a house with five other college students and we receive on average two or three telemarketing calls a day. Receiving unwanted calls at this volume can understandably become extremely bothersome. Upon learning of such registries as the Do-Not-Call registry I will be mailing in my information to be place on such a list with the hopes of lowering the amount of unwanted calls I receive at my residence. I appreciate the attention the FCC is giving in this issue and hope they will continue to try to better serve and protect the telephone consumer.
